“Online friendships enhance feelings of belonging, driven by trust and that players feel a deeper sense of belonging and feel more accepted by the gaming community than they are offline.”

“Here is one version of how far-right recruitment is supposed to work: Bobby queues up for a Fortnite match and gets paired with a big, bad skinhead Ryland. Ryland has between two and 20 minutes to make his pitch to Bobby over voice or text chat before enemy player Sally shotguns them both in the face. If Ryland’s vibe is intriguing, maybe Bobby accepts his Fortnite friend request; they catch some more games and continue their friendship on Discord. Over time, weeks or months, Ryland normalizes extremist ideology for Bobby and eventually the kid becomes radicalized.”

What we know

- There is growing concern games are spaces for extremist recruitment
- Extremism and radicalisation exists in gaming and game adjacent spaces
- That games seem to be particularly vulnerable to extremism and recruitment
 - Social reinforcement, “othering,” gamer cultures and identity

What we know

- Extremist networks are actively using game-centric platforms
- Games—across genres and audience sizes—frequently have some hateful or extremist activity
- Games with social hooks seem to have a higher propensity for extremist organization

A Growing Threat

1. Social hooks in games are increasing
2. Content moderation in games isn't as advanced as big social media

■ Content Moderation ■ Social Features

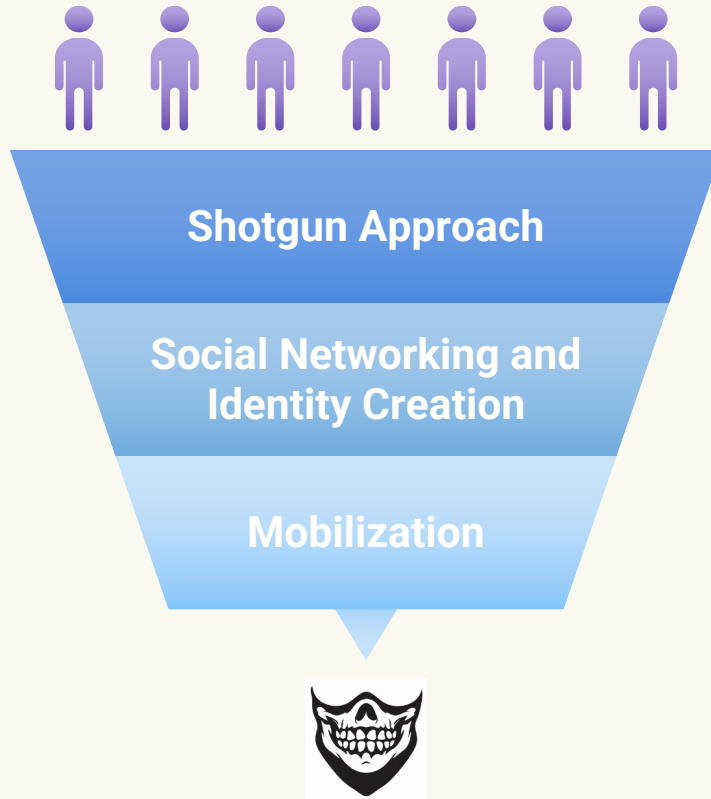

It's All About the Data

- Extremists use games of all genres and sizes, but we cannot know the scope of the problem without access to data
- The few games that provide open access to data seem disproportionately messy

Extremist Behavior

Extremist Behavior

Mobilization activity is complex

- Niche, obtuse references and meta-irony are generally directed toward already radicalized extremists
- Mobilization and organization is core to extremist sustainability
- Without strong relationships, extremist movements disappear

Identifying extremist activity in the wild

Conventional paradigm:

- Moderation takes a content-based approach to discovery
- Posts, user-generated content, usernames, etc. are analyzed in isolation
- Reliance on keyword lists, which can be inflexible and vulnerable to adversarial behavior

Adversarial Behavior Is Commonplace

Real-World Example: Anti-Semitism

“Around 100 years ago the Weimar Republic experienced the same things happening in entertainment and ultimately culture. Now Weimerica is experiencing the same. The same cabal of small hatted palm rubbing pedos are still running the same scam as they’ve done for ages”

We need a network approach to content moderation

Strategy: use a single user as a seed to discover many more

- Any relationship functionality can be leveraged to identify many more relevant individuals, groups, and content
- Stronger types of ties generally surface a higher density of dangerous content and users

How to Execute on the Strategy

- Engage with subject matter experts to diagnose trends and map networks
- Work with independent scientists to push past current debates and democratize data access to empower scientists to conduct independent and credible research

Concluding Thoughts

DIGITAL GAMES ARE CULTURAL ASSETS OF INFLUENCE
